The Melting Clock Stuart M. Kaminsky

In wartime L.A., milk prices are up. Margarine and gas can't be bought. For private eye Toby Peters, shoplifting patrol at the local Ralph's Grocery has been the only steady work. Into this grind of reality comes a hefty, dubiously welcome dose of surrealism, in the person of Salvador Dali, encamped in nearby Beverly Hills. The artful madman, whose professed mission it is to shock the world every 24 hours, has seen his latest publicity stunt go fatally, frighteningly amok.

Drawn into a bizarre new world of mustaches without faces, crumbling stone women, and watches melting on the Victory Drugstore grill, Toby has to hunt down a treasure of three precious paintings and three priceless clocks, while wading through a growing thicket of bodies for whom life will be forever still. Hovering over the twisted landscape is the curse of a killer even madder than Dali, and more indestructible than a Sherman tank.
